Team 4 Report: Pronominal Relative Clauses on Twitter

Our main goal for this project was to compose a similar experiment to that of Conrod, Tatman, & Koncel-Kedziorski (2016). They used a Twitter database to extract their data from and applied several filters until all unwanted tweets (tweets that were not pronominal relative clauses) were removed. They were able to filter 10,000 tweets to just 3,261 tweets. Their results informed them that PRCs are very important in our contemporary English, and only 37% of their collected PRC tweets were un-literary.

In our data, we began with 1,000 Tweets to filter through. From our first filter, we removed duplicate Tweets and we ended up with 992 Tweets total. Once we applied our second filter we were left with 878 tweets. Then, we applied the third filter which gave us 700 tweets. Our fourth filter gave 664 tweets. Lastly, after applying our fifth filter we had 570 tweets.

We began our experiment with a smaller pool of data than Conrod, Tatman, & Koncel-Kedziorski had. Ultimately, we ended up with 498 literary tweets and 72 non-literary tweets while CTK's experiment had 1222 non-literary tweets. We counted and analyzed the tweets we collected and we discovered that we had a high proportion of data for 'you + who' and little to none for the rest of the pronouns, plus we had a total of 570 pro-who tweets. This is probably linked to a code error because this is actually the opposite of CTK's experiment results.

Project Proposals:

- 1) Does scripted spontaneous speech in film occur as frequently in actual spontaneous speech?

This project question looks at the natural occurrence of disfluencies in actual spontaneous speech and compares it to those in scripted spontaneous speech in films. This phenomena could be investigated with a corpus for both the film and natural language examples. The populations who might produce the data we're interested in include adults ages 18-55. This would allow for natural script to be accumulated at an ease since it would be assumed that these native speakers of English are speaking with a full range of English words. Most of the data would be collected from closed captions or subtitles of a film or a couple of films.

Examples:

- “How do you say..
Umm..
Please in French?”
- “Umm that's not a polite thing to say”
- “Ugh, this really sucks!”
- “Mmm I'm too cold to go outside.”

- 2) What words usually occur after disfluencies (“um” vs “uh”) in scripted spontaneous speech versus natural speech.

This second project question examines the context in which disfluencies occur in both natural and scripted spontaneous speech. We would like to gain some insight into what types of words either follow or precede the “um’s” and “uh’s” that occur throughout language. Similarly, this phenomena will be investigated with a corpus for examples in film and natural speech. This population of people should also include adults ages 18-55 when acquiring data for actual spontaneous speech. For data that we need for spontaneous speech in film, we can take a look at either the closed captions or subtitles to look for disfluencies.

Examples:

- “Uh I don’t know what to say to you”
- “How about you give me the..
Umm...
The pink one!”
- “I assumed that you uhh.. didn’t want to go”
